Innuguration of President Lincoln. The Inauguration of President Lincoln for his second term of office took place on Saturday. The occasion was one of high interest, though the out door orremonies were rendered less imposing by the prevailing rainstorm. The procession formed about cleven o'clock. in a hency rain, and escerted Mr. Lenceln to the Capital, through streets rendered almost impassable for foot possengers by mud. your ling the thip tall about a quarter to dition. He neither enlarges upon the nation's power and resources, nor alludes to our relations with other nations and difficulthrown in the way of our own proper course, and the assistance and encouragement which they have given to the rebellion. No doubt had be done so, the address would have been both able and interesting; but of what use would such a review be? The nation knows all these things already, and is not likely to forget them. As to his policy, generally, he could not state it so that it would be more plainly understood than it has been; and as for details, as it would have been impossible four years ago for any human being to foresee them all, so now, they must be left for the future to reveal them. We must do our duty and leave the rest to God. Friends may at first wish that the President had said more which they would have which they can find fault with. Foreign dress as they have sneered at all that Mr. | sound of Sherman's advance came, Lincoln has said; but the loval beart of the Nation over which he presides, will understand his address and sympathize with it. The few notices or it which we give below, will sufficiently indicate how it is received by the public press.

The President, in assuming the responsibilities of his second term, indulges in but few words. He makes no boasts of what he has done, or promises of what he will do. He does not reexpound the principles of the war; does not re-declare the worth of the Union; does not repro-claim that absolute submission to the Cons.ituof the Confederacy to rave like a mudman.
